Manuel Rotenberg Photo Exhibit

Oct 3, 2015 – Dec 18 2015

Manuel Rotenberg is a Canadian-born physicist. He took up photography in 1955 while he was a staff member at Los Alamos National Laboratory. He left photography when he became an academic and took it up again when he retired from UCSD in 1993. The late Arthur Wagner, the founding chair of the Department of Theatre and Dance, encouraged Rotenberg to photograph actors during rehearsals and performances and this has become a major activity. He also photographs most of the major dance companies throughout the city.

Candid photography, which is the main component of the present show at the UCSD Faculty Club (his third), was initiated by Henri Bresson-Cartier in 1929. He was an art student in Paris when he was handed a then-novel Leica 35 mm camera. He set the standards of street photography, or, euphemistically, urban investigative photography.

Cartier-Bresson set the rules: All composition had to be done in the viewfinder - no postproduction cropping. Aside from enlarging, you had to take what you shot. I have strayed somewhat from his dictum but what you see on the walls of the Faculty Club have been tampered with as little as I could get away with.

Paris is probably the most photographed city on the planet. The buildings, the museums, the river, the bridges, and the light from the ever-present pale sky all make the city a painter's and photographer's dream. But this presents a problem: Almost everything you do is a cliché. Of the hundreds of photos I have taken in Paris, I have selected a few that avoid the post-card views of the city.

Dear Mr. Mignano,

On behalf of the Institute of the Americas: Teaching the Next Generation of Latin-American Scientist, I want to thank you and your staff for hosting our group of 25 participants on both August 17th & 20th. The participants truly enjoyed their lunch, but most importantly, they felt welcomed by the attentive staff. Year after year, the Institute of the Americas take a variety of groups to the Faculty Club, and every time we receive nothing but great positive feedback. Thank you and your staff for making our days very memorable and definitely look forward to our next visit.
